Reaching her peak

Woodside septuagenarian climbs Mt. Kilimanjaro

Alma and Austri Fletcher of Woodside watched solitary headlamps snake up the mountain ahead of them as they hiked toward the summit of Mt. Kilimanjaro in the early morning hours of July 25. The mother and daughter had started the climb at midnight, donning headlamps and extra clothing.

"It was like a torchlight parade," said Alma, who was taking on the mighty challenge of climbing the highest mountain in Africa at the age of 72. The scene reminded Austri, 41, of the Seven Dwarfs from Snow White, marching off to work.

Ahead of them, the women could see only the feet of the guides whom Alma and Austri had hired at the hotel at the bottom of the mountain.

Most of the lights were going up the mountain, but several were descending, Alma recalls.

They passed at least four hikers who weren't able to brave either the steep incline or the altitude, and Alma knew that she was slowing down, too. "I didn't expect the last (portion of the) climb to be so difficult. I didn't have enough energy."

But in the end, she proved that she had just enough — with a little help from a nutritional supplement taken on the trail and, no doubt, from having kept up over the years a daily physical regimen that has kept her remarkably fit into her eighth decade of life.

REACHING THE SUMMIT

But in the wee hours of that bracingly cold day in July, she didn't feel all too fit.

At around 3 a.m., Austri thought she and her mother might have to turn around if Alma couldn't get her energy up. But as a last resort, she forced down some energy gel, a nutritional supplement used mainly by endurance runners and other athletes; she had been reluctant to take the gel because of her failing appetite, and because she hated the taste. But once she did, her pace picked up almost immediately.

Shortly after sunrise, the women reached Stella Point at the crater rim, at 18,800 feet considered to be the summit of Kilimanjaro, a volcano.

Alma then began the descent from the mountain, while Austri continued hiking to the true peak at 19,340 feet.

Reaching the crater rim would be an impressive feat for anyone, especially someone who's 72 years old, but Alma smiles and shakes her head when she thinks about it.

"I wish we had started (eating the gel) at midnight," she says, sitting in the living room of her home off Skyline Boulevard, near King's Mountain Road. If she had, she says, she might have joined her daughter for the last 500 feet.

When Alma and Austri Fletcher descended 6,000 feet to an emergency base camp, they wrapped up what both women call the most strenuous day of exercise in their lives. By the time they came to a rest that afternoon, they had been hiking for nearly 15 hours.

UNCERTAINTY

Alma's disappointment at missing her chance to reach the highest peak typifies her eager, can-do attitude, especially when it comes to feats of physical endurance. She had agreed to undertake the five-and-a-half-day trek up the mountain only after Austri found no takers during two years of appealing to friends and co-workers to make the trek with her.

Even then, Alma was skeptical of her chances, especially because they had decided to take the Machame trail, perhaps the hardest route.

"I didn't think I'd make it," she says. "The hotel staff didn't think I'd make it."

Alma had doubts about whether she would even be able to start the climb, much less reach the summit. Only two weeks before, she and Austri had walked 200 miles along the path from Le Puy in France to the Spanish border, completing a five-summer-long trek across Spain and part of France that began in Santiago de Compostella in the northwest corner of Spain.

Around mile 170, Alma developed edema in her ankle, causing it to swell. She spent the next two weeks resting at the base of Mont Blanc in France with her foot elevated, while Austri hiked up the mountain to acclimate for Kilimanjaro.

Alma saw a doctor who feared that she had a blood clot, but was cleared to climb the mountain under the condition that she turn around and hike down if her ankle got any worse.

SNOWS OF KILIMANJARO

In addition to the altitude, Alma and Austri also had to withstand harsh weather conditions because Kilimanjaro is in the southern hemisphere; it was the dead of winter in late July. Alma says that she wore two fleece jackets some nights and slept in a bag that was made for temperatures as low as 20 degrees below zero.

The climate continued to change the higher they climbed, from rainforest to high desert to lava rock. Alma and Austri say that the famed glaciers at the top of the peak were breathtaking as they walked beside them, though they have receded dramatically in recent years as the climate has warmed.

One of the most difficult sections for the women came on the fourth day, when they had to scramble up the steep, 1,000-foot-high Barranco Wall, made up entirely of lava rocks. If Alma was going to turn back, that was the likeliest place. But her head guide, Charles Lyimo, helped her up the rocks by holding onto her hand while she grasped handholds that had been installed along the route.

Despite the strenuous sections, both Alma and Austri say that the climb was easier than they had originally thought it would be.

LOVE OF NATURE, EXERCISE

Alma says that she has been walking religiously since 1958, when she started to hike in the Sierra Nevada mountain range with the Sierra Club. She met her husband on a backpacking trip in the Sierra.

She has climbed Mount Whitney in California — the tallest mountain in the lower 48 states — and trekked in Nepal with Austri and her son Mark in 2000, where she reached the peak of Muktinath, a Buddhist pilgrimage site, at 12,475 feet.

She walks for about an hour every morning with a group of friends, and also does yoga, aerobics and swimming.

Austri says she trained for about two and a half hours per day in preparation for the trip, mixing aerobics with weight lifting.

Alma says that she feels strongly about exercising, and wishes that other Americans would do more of it.

"It's cheap to walk every day," Alma says.

"It's free," Austri corrects with a grin.

After conquering Kilimanjaro, mother and daughter completed their trip with a weeklong safari in Africa — the vacation they had originally planned before they decided to squeeze in the climb.

Instead of taking it easy next summer, they're now entertaining the idea of walking along a 200-mile trail along Germany's Rhine River. ■

History talk on life at sea

The past is easily romanticized. Take, for example, that thrilling age when shipmates scudded through the blue bounding main in sturdy wooden ships driven by the pure wind and white billowing sails.

They are certainly the old days, but apparently they were not the good old days. Professor Fabio Lopez Lazaro of Santa Clara University will talk about life at sea in days of sail — a life that was "difficult at best and often unsanitary, uncomfortable and unbearable" — in a lecture at the Museum of American Heritage.

The program starts at 7:30 p.m. Thursday, September 21, in the Frank Livermore Learning Center at the museum, 351 Homer Ave. in Palo Alto. An exhibit of locally crafted model sailing ships opens at 7 p.m. Admission is $5, which is waived for museum members. For more information, call 321-1004 or go to moah.org.

Paul & Gretchen DeStefano (Menlo Park Sellers) say...

"I listed my home with Maggie based on the strong recommendation of friends who had worked with her in the past. Shortly after listing, family health problems and unexpected work issues made it impossible for me to take an active role as was expected in repairs, staging, clean-up and the like. Maggie - backed by a remarkably competent and responsive circle of service providers - took care of everything. Thanks entirely to Maggie, the house looked its absolute best and, as a result of this and her expert negotiating skills, we sold at well over the asking price within days. Maggie gets my strongest recommendation."
